The Paris correspondent

of the London Times writes, under date of September 13th:

New York to the Mobile Register, says of a portion of southern Pennsylvania, over which he has recently traveled:

You ride over a country dotted with farms, greaning under crops, and are surprised at the lack of laborers, and wonder who does all the work goes in as if by magic. These Pennsylvania, with hew three millions of population, enjoys productions equal to the labor of six millions. The same processes would make the bouth a garden of fruitfulness, the shode of a great population and the seast of power. We have all that Pennsylvania has, in coal, fron, and vaster power, without her harsh winter loss of Tampino is another disease.
